How He Told His Story; His Childhood; His Mother and Father; His Trying Experiences.

CHAFTER VIL.

MR. BEAR'S EARLY EDUCATION.
Dr. Littlynomp rose from his chair, and cstended one hand like a gentleman or scentor about to make a fine speech, while with the thumb of his other hand he touched his forchead to indicate wisdom. "I am'of opinion." said be, "that The Doctor was about to roply, but the sneeze enught him, so that, instead of saying "Very true, sir," he said, "Poopos sir!"

So the thought struck me that they were the thisves, and I at once seebsof them. The wild pig indignantly denied that he had stolou a single acorn, and would not be called a thief by anybody. The little fox said the accusation was unjust and cruel, and also not good, sense, as he had never men and bears, who give their, whole minds up to one thing at a time, and will neither hear, see, smell, taste; touch nor think of anything else, are probably the best judges of this one thing at that time—but not of its consequences." The Doctor was here taken with a violent fit of speezing; he continued his philosophy however, in spite of it. "And I think, horeover," said he, "that—pschew!—that men and bears who are always determined to have their—pschew!—their rights, are apt to fancy everything right which they wish to—pschew!—to do or to have. Ah,—tschew! And even when they really see the—pschew!—the truth, and what is actually—pool—what is actually—pschew!—the truth, and what is actually—pool—what is actually—pschew!—I beg ten thousand pardons—pool—and even when they really do see what is true, and actually right in itself—that is right for everybody—they do not go the right way to obtain it. Taking care to preserve a due respect for my father's memory, she nevertheless explained to me, that our less, both of him and our comfortable cava, was entirely occasioned by his hasty, tempor, his want or endurance and ferbearance, and his obstinate character. My mother shed tears as she explained and this, but said it was only too true. We had lost him and our home, and he had lost us and his home, and was now ho, a menageric at Berlin.

"My mother divided avery day into various portions: but although a considerable share was given to amusement, in which I played with several young hears of my own age, and had occasionally a gambol with other juvenils animals, still trere was nothing that gave me more pleasure than the lessons I received from her. For this purpose she would generally take me into some volired part of the wood, and, seated under a wide-spieading tree, she taught my young ideas 'how to shoot.' One lesson in particular I remember, as she took great pains to impress it on my memory. The principle it inculcated has influenced my conduct through life, and I can truly say, upon all occusions, with the best results to myself. It was conveyed in the following little-verse:

"Oh! thou small Bear, Learn to beer and forbear, And of good l

And of good luck, or good friends, never despair.

"A few days after I had received this beson, I found myself placed in a situation to require the good advice it gave me. An extremely well behaved young wild boar, and a very merry little for, with whom I was playing took the opportunity of askins me what I had been doing the other day near a certain hollow tree. I fold them I often collected acorns there ine the morning, and went in the evening to eat them. They said no mare, and we went on playing round about the trees, and sometimes climbing up themethat is, the merry little fox and I; the young wild pig could not. But after that day whenever I collected acorns in the morning, in the hollow tree and went at might to eat them, they were all gone!

"One evening, however, as I twas returning home after my disappointment, and wondering who it could be, I heard loughing areidst the thickets, and an-

On heating this, 1, with an intelligence beyond my years, instantly understood how it all was. 'Jemmy,' said I, fixing my eyes upon the little fox, Jemmy!—you know years well that you stole my accorns. We upon the little fox, Jemmy -you know very well that you stole my acorns. We have often played together, and this is the first bad trick you have ever served me. You know I am quite able to punish you severely, and take your tall away from you. But I forgive you this time. Then turning to the young wild pig, who stood looking very stupid, and ellent, and flerce, with his eyes half shut, and needing out of the corners of them and peeping out of the corners of them-'Hugo,' said I, in a mild voice, and laying one paw upon the top of his brist-ling back, 'you have eaten my acornsnature for good results. Now, child, go upon the moist green grass, with her to sleep. "

"What a dear, good natured Mrs." "As the bear uttered these last words, and the train stopped within a few feet of Tom. Tom's father asked him what was the matter. Tom told him about the ties being on the track. About this time, the conductor having come un and learned of Tom's bravery slipped a sliver dollar in his hand. Jack received a dollar, too, but Tom was called the hero of the day, ALBERT L, JEFFREYS.

Mother Bear!" said Nancy, half in a whisper to Valentine. "I quite love her!"

"And good natured little son, too," answered Valentine, also in a half whisper.

"I wish every nature in the world were equally good," added Dr. Littlepump, with an approving smile upon the children's commentary.

"In, this manner," pursued Mr. B., "I passed my early youth, and was just coming to the maturity of my size and strength, when the domestic calamity occurred, to which I once alluded the

It was just before Carlstmas, and the dolls in the toy shops played all night. One was from Parls, and proposed having a party before they were separated. So they had their party in the window; one doll played on the toy piano, and they all danced to the music.
